KEEP DOWN THE BACTERIA IN MILK

During hot summer days, a great deal is heard about basteria getting in milk. Often the thing that is forgotten is where the bacteria come from.

Specialists say that by knowing the danger spots, farmers can help reduce this hazard. The best way to identify bacteria sources is to follow the job of milk production. The first contributing factor is the cow. If she's healthy, the number of bacteria in the milk will be few. However, if a mastitis infection should be present, the number of bacteria in the milk at first could be very high. Then there's the barn air and the exterior of the cow's body to consider. Following this, utensils such as pails, cans, and milking machines all contribute bacteria. In fact, dairy utensils generally contribute a larger number of bacteria than any other source from the time the milk leaves the cow until it is placed in the cooling tank.

EGGS BY THE POUND SUGGESTED BY ECONOMIST

Eggs by the pound are being boosted as a means of selling small eggs more profitably.

Dr. Robert Krueger, associate agricultural economist at VPI, points out that a pound is a pound, and there is no logical reason to penalize small eggs by selling them by the dozen.

Consumers shy away from small eggs, not because they feel they are inferior from a nutritive standpoint, but because they feel they are getting more for their money when buying large eggs. The only way, therefore, to increase consumption of small pullet eggs is to sell them at a price low enough so they are obviously a better value than the larger sizes.

Dr. Kruger proposes selling eggs which are sized, graded, and packed in one-dozen cartons, but priced by the pound. Place a tag on each carton, similar to the one which appears on packages of self-service meat, giving the weight of the eggs in the carton, the price per pound, and the price of that particular carton.
